The lecture addresses the emergence of sensitivity toward modern architectural heritage, the different perspectives of restoration cultures, and the current challenge of sustainability in the conservation of modern and contemporary heritage.

The discussion will be supported by the case study of the latest IDC Workshop, The Hall of Records by Richard Neutra and Robert Alexander in Los Angeles (1962), offering the opportunity to analyze different interpretations of conservation and sustainability.

In particular, the lecture will question the reductionist approach that equates sustainability solely with energy performance, neglecting its cultural, historical, and identity-related dimensions.
